Read the following passage and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questions.

In many homes, "Look at your cousin" is meant to open a door, not start a war. Parents use a classmate as a benchmark, hoping to scaffold effort and show what work can produce. Comparison sounds harmless at breakfast before school begins, yet a child may hear a private verdict on personal worth. Trouble begins when a person becomes an impeccable poster on the fridge: no mess, no bad day, no fear. Over time, this habit turns encouragement into scrutiny. Dinner becomes a small courtroom.

Teenagers may emulate the praised child, borrowing study plans or calmer routines. [I] Trouble appears when the example stops being a map and becomes a mirror. [II] A teenager then asks why personal page stays behind, rather than which step could make tomorrow's practice less confusing. [III] At such a moment, a notebook becomes a public scoreboard, and every grade feels like a debt. Parents may not intend a detrimental message, but they sometimes move the goalposts after each improvement. [IV] A higher mark brings a new neighbor, a new cousin, or a story.

Better practice starts with a more precise yardstick. A parent can say, "Lan rewrote mistakes after school; would such a routine help?" Such wording keeps comparison as a scaffold, not a blindfold. The useful question is not who stands higher, but which habit can be borrowed without erasing a young identity. A double-edged sword becomes less sharp when adults explain the blade: admiration on one side, pressure on the other. In homes trying to keep up with the Joneses, validation often comes from outside applause, and a child may misconstrue love as a prize. Still, it can invite reflection when linked to effort and choice. Praise becomes a ladder with missing steps if no one names the steps.

Practical life offers an answer. A scholarship winner, a fast pianist, or a neat desk can be useful information, but none should become a ledger against a child. Overzealous praise of another child may look motivational, while hidden exasperation can obfuscate the parent's real concern during talk. A child who reads such praise as rejection may work harder for a while, yet the aftertaste is fear, not curiosity. The better choice is to compare a child with a previous version, while naming skills demonstrated by another person. With that choice, comparison becomes a window rather than a whip.

Read the following passage and mark the letter A, B, C, or D on your answer sheet to indicate the best answer to each of the following questions.

New goods once entered a home after a need: a broken kettle, a bag, shoes worn out by walking. Many households now buy goods because a new item can signal comfort, speed, or identity before any practical need appears. An online cart turns a passing mood into a doorstep package, and the package may feel like a small repair for an incomplete day. This does not make every purchase ill-considered, but the shift turns consumption from problem solving into self-management.

Price often hides the later work attached to ownership. A discount can feel sensible because the saving is visible, while the future crowding remains easy to ignore. A new item must be opened, the old version stored, and the unwanted object carried toward resale, donation, or landfill. It also uses attention, shelf space, and energy, so a cheap purchase can become expensive after the receipt disappears. In apartments, costs pile up as cables, mugs, chargers, and clothes compete with room for living.

Overconsumption is not solved by guilt alone. Moral pressure may create fatigue, while a practical pause can reveal the real appetite behind a wish. Rather than asking whether a purchase is affordable, a slower question asks what role the object will play. People may pause before checkout because desire often changes after the screen is closed for a while. A waiting habit can prevent buyers from giving in to the shine of a new image. They are not rejecting pleasure; the point is to separate usefulness from quick gratification.

Real change also depends on shopping and living surroundings. Shops can label repair services more clearly, buildings can offer shared tools, and schools can teach repair before replacement becomes automatic. Community libraries for objects, second-hand shelves, and repair cafés make lower ownership less lonely. These do not replace private judgment, but such options reduce pressure to keep buying by making maintenance visible and ordinary. A smaller footprint and slower depletion are practical benefits, not badges of superiority. The result is not joyless living; ambition no longer needs surplus as proof.
